All's 'Fair' in Love and War

All the cards were on the table Wednesday when the Cinema Society and Giorgio Armani hosted a screening of "Fair Game" at the Museum of Modern Art in New York. Afterward, stars and spies alike headed to the Armani Ristorante to sip Grey Goose cocktails and talk about film. Director Doug Liman touched on privacy and truth when making the movie. "We couldn't sit Valerie Plame down and say, 'Tell us what happened.' She'd be arrested, but we wanted to be as truthful as possible so I read as many books as I could find," he said. "I felt like I took a three-year poly sci course." Star Naomi Watts, meanwhile, had her own issues to tackle: "When you just tell the story, it's really exciting, but the truth is it's just a bunch of paperwork." — Cameron Rose

A 'Stone's' Throw

"The film is essentially people having conversations with each other," Edward Norton said of his role's biggest challenge at Tuesday's Overture Films' screening of "Stone" at the Museum of Modern Art. "We needed to find a way to make that interesting." For co-star Milla Jovovich, the difficulties were personal. "My character [Lucetta] is not a good person. But how did you leave that behind? There were times I made a point of not bringing my baby on the set. I didn't want her around me when I was like that." — Cameron Rose

Saving Their Own

Hollywood legends, icons and veteran actors gathered for Tuesday's 1 Voice to raise awareness and protest the pending closure of the Motion Picture Home's skilled nursing care unit. Richard Dreyfuss, Diane Ladd, Connie Stevens, Renee Taylor and Joseph Bologna were among those in attendance. Whether saving the home is feasible, good business or an impossible quest, the message was that people in show business take care of their own. "We may be the collective Sisyphus pushing the rock up the hill," Bologna told THR, "but we've got to try." Others on hand included SAG president Ken Howard, Stefanie Powers and Anthony Michael Hall. Performers included Esai Morales, John Schneider, Gloria Loring and Kathryn Joosten. — Alex Ben Block
